

A FRIEND of the FAMILY

By RUDYARD KIPLING

ILLUSTRATED BY A. C. VALENTINE

THERE had been rather a long sitting at Lodge "Faith and Works" 5836 E. C., that warm April night in '19. Three initiations and two raisings, each conducted with the spaciousness and particularity that our Lodge prides itself upon, made the Brethern a little silent, and the strains of the Dead March had not yet lifted from them.

"There are just two pieces that ought to be barred forever," said a brother as we were sitting down to the banquet. "'Last Post' is the other."

"I can stand 'Last Post.' It's 'Tipperary' breaks me," another replied. "But I expect every one carries his own firing-irons inside him."

I turned to look. It was a sponsor for one of our newly raised Brethern—a fat man with a fish-like and vacant face, but evidently prosperous. We introduced ourselves as we took our places. His name was Bevin, and he had a chicken-farm near Chalfont-St. Giles, whence he supplied, on yearly contract, two or three high-class London hotels. He was also, he said, on the edge of launching out into herb growing.

"There's a demand for herbs," said he; "but it all depends upon your connections with the wholesale dealers. We ain't systematic. The French do it much—better—especially in the mountains on the Swiss an' Italy sides. Our patent-medicine business has killed it off to a great extent. But there's a demand still, if your connections are sound. I'm going in for it."

A large, well-groomed brother across the table (his name was Pole, and he seemed some sort of a professional man) struck in with a detailed account of a hollow behind a destroyed village on the Somme where, for no ascertainable reason, a certain rather scarce herb had sprung up out of the overturned earth, he said, by the acre.

"Only you've got to poke in among the weeds to find it, and there's any quantity of bombs an' stuff knockin' about there still. They haven't cleaned it up yet."

"Last time I saw the place," said Bevin, "I thought it 'ud be that way till Judgment Day. You know how it lay in that dip under the beet factory. I saw it bombed up level in two days—with brick-dust mainly. They were huntin' for St. Firmin Dump." He reached for a sandwich and munched slowly, wiping his face, for the night was close.

"Ye-es," said Pole. "The trouble is there hasn't been any Judgment taken or executed. That's why the world is where it is now. We didn't need anything but justice—afterwards. Not gettin' that, the bottom fell out of things, naturally."

"That's how I look at it too," Bevin replied. "We didn't want all that talk afterwards—we only wanted justice. What I say is, there must be a right and a wrong to things. It can't all be kiss an' make friends no matter what you do."

A THIN, dark brother on my left who had been attending to a cold pork pie (there are no pork pies to equal ours, for Brother Lemming, of Lemming and Orton, the print sellers, breeds the pigs at his little place in Berkshire), suddenly lifted his long head, in which a pale blue glass eye swiveled insantly.

"Well," he said slowly. "My motto is 'Never again.' Never again for me."

"Same here—till next time," said Pole across the table. "You're from Sidney, ain't you?"

"How d'you know?" was the short answer.

An amazing, incredible act of friendship, by a man who had never seen a table-cloth until he was thirty years old

"You spoke." The other smiled. So did Mr. Bevin, who added: "I know how your push talk, well enough. Have you started that Republic of yours down under yet?"

"No. But we're goin' to. Then you'll see."

"Carry on. No one's hindering," Bevin pursued.

The Australian scowled. "No. We know they ain't. And—and—that's what makes us all so crazy angry with you." He threw back his head and laughed the spleen out of him. "What can you do with an Empire that—that don't care what you do?"

"I've heard that before," Bevin laughed, and his fat sides shook. "Oh, I know your push inside out."

"When did you come across us? My name's Orton—no relation to the Tich-bourne case."

"Gallip'li—dead mostly. My battalion began there. We only lost half."

"Lucky! They gambled us away in two days—'Member the hospital on the Beach?" said Orton.

"Yes. An' the man without the face—preaching," said Bevin, sitting up a little.

"'Till he died," said the Australian, his voice lowered.

"And afterwards," Bevin added, lower still.

"Were you there that night?"

Bevin nodded. The Australian choked off something he was going to say, as a brother on his left claimed him. I heard them talk horses, while Bevin developed his herb-growing projects with the well-groomed brother opposite.

AT THE end of the banquet when pipes were drawn, the Australian addressed himself to Bevin, across me, and as the company rearranged itself, we three came to anchor in the big anteroom where the best prints are hung. Here our brother across the table joined us, and moored alongside, beneath the portraits of Peter Gilkes and Barton Wilson, the Fathers, as we know, of "Emulation" working.

The Australian was full of racial grievance, as must be in a young country; alternating between complaints that his people had not been appreciated enough in England, or too fulsomely complimented by an hysterical press.

"No-o," Pole drawled, after awhile. "You're altogether wrong. We hadn't time to notice anything—we were all too busy fightin' for our lives. What your crowd down under are suffering from is growing pains. You'll get over 'em in three hundred years or so—if you're allowed to last so long."

"Who's going to stoush us?" Orton asked fiercely.

This turned the talk again to larger issues and possibilities—delivered on both sides straight from the shoulder without malice or heat, between bursts of song from round the piano at the far end. Bevin and I sat out, watching.

"Well, I don't understand these matters," said Bevin at last. "They're too high for me. But I'd hate to have one of your crowd have it in for me for anything."

"Would you? Why?" Orton pierced him with his artificial eye.

"Well, you're a trifle—what's the word?—vindictive?—spiteful? At least that's what I've found. I expect it comes from drinking stewed tea with meat four times a day," said Bevin. "No! I'd hate to have an Australian after me for anything in particular."

Out of this came his tale—somewhat in this shape:

It opened with an Australian of the name of Hickmot or Hickmer—Bevin called him both—who, finding his battalion completely expended at Gallipoli, had joined up with what stood of Bevin's battalion and there remained, unrebuked and unnoticed. The point that Bevin labored was that the man had never seen a table-cloth, a china plate, or a dozen white people together till, in his thirtieth year, he had walked for two months to Brisbane to join up. Pole found this hard to believe.

"But it's true," Bevin insisted. "This chap was born an' bred among the black fellers as they call 'em—two hundred miles from the nearest town; and four hundred miles from a railway, an' ten thousand from the grace o' God—out in Queensland near some desert."

I found Hickmot making mud pies in a farm-yard an' Bert lookin' on.

"Why, of course. We come out of everywhere," said Orton. "What's wrong with that?"

"Yes—but—Look here! From the time that man Hickmot was twelve years old he'd ridden, driven—what's the word?—conducted sheep for his father for thousands of miles on end, an' months at a time, alone with these black fellers that you daren't show the back of your neck to—else they knock your head in. That was all that he'd ever done till he joined up. He—he didn't belong to anything in the world, you understand. And he didn't strike other men as being a—human being."

"Why? He was only a Queensland drover. They're all right," Orton explained.

"I dare say, but—well, a man notices another man, don't he? You'd notice if there was a man standing or sitting or lyin' near you, wouldn't you? So'd any one. But you'd never notice Hickmot. His bein' anywhere about wouldn't stay in your mind. He just didn't draw attention any more than anything else that happened to be about. Have you got it?"

"Wasn't he any use at his job?" Pole inquired.

"I've nothing against him that way, an' I'm—I was his Platoon Sergeant. He wouldn't volunteer specially for any doings, but he'd slip out with the party and he'd slip back with what was left of 'em. No one noticed him, and he never opened his mouth about any doings. You'd think a man who had lived the way he'd lived among black fellers an' sheep would be noticeable enough, in an English battalion, wouldn't you?"

"It teaches us to lie close, but you seem to have noticed him," Orton interposed, with a little suspicion.

"Not at the time—but afterwards. If he was noticeable it was on account of his unnoticeability—same way you'd notice there not being an extra step at the bottom of the staircase when you thought there was."

"Ye-es," Pole assented suddenly. "It's the eternal mystery of personality. 'God before Whom ever lie bare'—Some people can occlude their personality like turning off a tap. I beg your pardon. Carry on!"

"Granted," said Bevin, warming to it. "I think I catch your drift. I used to think I was a student of human nature before I joined up."

"What was your job—before?" Orton asked.

"Oh, I was the young blood of the village. Full back in our Soccer team, Secretary of the local Cricket and Rifle—oh! Lor'!—clubs—yes, an' village theatricals. My father was the chemist in the village. How I did talk! What I did know in my babyhood!" He beamed upon us all.

"I don't mind hearing you talk," said Orton, lying back in his chair. "You're a little different from some of 'em. What happened to this dam' drover of yours?"

"HE WAS with our push for the rest of the time—an' I don't think he ever sprung a dozen words at one time. With his upbringing, you see, there wasn't any subject that any man knew about he could open up on. He kept quiet, and mixed with his backgrounds. If there was a lump of dirt, or a hole in the ground, or what was—was left after anythin' had happened, it would be Hickmot. That was all he wanted to be."

"A camouflager?" Orton suggested.

"You have it! He was the complete camouflager all through. That's him to a dot. Look here! He hadn't even a nickname in his platoon. And then a friend of mine from our village, of the name of Vigers, came out with a draft. Bert Vigers. As a matter of fact I was engaged to his sister. And Bert hadn't been with us a week before they called him 'The Grief.' His father was an oldish man—a market-gardener—high-class vegetables, bit o' glass an'—an' all the rest of it. Do you know anything about that particular business?"

"Not much, I'm afraid," said Pole, "except that glass is expensive, and your man always sells cut flowers."

"Then you do know something about it. It is. Bert was the old man's only son—an' I don't blame him. He'd done his damndest to get exempted—for the sake of the business, you understand. But he caught it all right. The Tribunal wasn't takin' any the day he went up. Bert was for it, with a few remarks from the patriotic old was-sers on the Bench. Our county paper had 'em all."

"That's the thing that made one really want the Hun in England for a week or two," said Pole.

"Mvor osee! The same Tribunal, havin' copped Bert gave unconditional exemption to the opposition shop—man called Margetts in the market-garden business which he'd established since the war, with his two sons who, every one in the village knew, had been pushed into the business to save their damned hides. But Margetts had a good lawyer to advise him. The whole case was frank and above board to a degree—our county paper had it all in too. Agriculture produce—vital necessity; the plough mightier than the sword, an' those ducks on the Bench, who had turned down Bert, noddin' and smilin' at Margetts all full of his cabbage and green peas. What happened? The usual. Vigers' business—he's sixty-eight, with asthma—goes smash, and Margetts & Co. double theirs. So then, that was Bert's grievance, an' he joined us full of it. That's why they called him The Grief."

"Knowing the facts I was with him, but being his Sergeant I had to check him because grievances are catchin', and three or four men with 'em, make companies—er—sticky. Luckily Bert wasn't handy with his pen. He had to cork up his grievance mostly till he came across Hickmot, an' Gord in Heaven knows what brought those two together. No! As y'were; I'm wrong about God! I always am. It was sheep. Bert knew's much about sheep as I do—an' that's Canterbury lamb—but he'd let Hickmot talk about 'em for hours, in return for Hickmot listenin' to his grievance. Hickmot 'ud talk sheep—the one created thing he'd ever open up on—an' Bert 'ud talk his grievance while they was waiting to go over the top. I've heard 'em again an' again, and, of course, I encouraged 'em. Now, look here! Hickmot hadn't seen an English house or a field or a road or—anything any civilized man is used to in all his life! Sheep an' blacks! Market gardens an' glass an' exemption tribunals. An' the men's teeth chatterin' behind their masks between rum issue an' zero. Oh, there was fun in Hell those days, wasn't there, boys?"

"Sure! Oh, sure!" Orton chuckled, and Pole echoed him.

"Look here! When we were lying up somewhere among those forsaken chicken camps back o' Doullens, I found Hickmot making mud-pies in a farmyard an' Bert lookin' on. He'd made a model of our village according to Bert's description of it. He'd preserved it in his head through all those weeks an' weeks o' Bert's yap; an' he'd coughed it all up—Margetts' house and gardens, old Mr. Vigers' ditto; both pubs; my father's shop, everything that he'd been told by Bert done out to scale in mud with bits o' brick and stick. Haig ought to

A.C.
V
1924

"Who's going to stoush us?"
Orton asked fiercely.

have seen it, but as his Sergeant I had to check him for misusin' his winkelpin on dirt. Come to think of it, a man who runs about uninhabited countries with sheep for a livin', must have gifts for mappin' and scalin' things, or he'd be dead. I never saw anything like it—all out o' what Bert had told him by word of mouth. An' the next time we went up to the line, Hickmot copped it in the leg just in front of me."

"FINISH!" I asked.

"Oh, no. Only beginnin'. That was in December, somethin' or other, '16. In Jan'y Vigers copped it for keeps. I buried him—snowin' blind it was—an' before we'd got him under the whole show was crumped. I wanted to bury him again just to spite 'em (I'm a spiteful man by nature), but the burial party wasn't takin' any more—even if they could have found it. But, you see, we had buried him all right, which is what they want at home, and I wrote the usual trimmin's about the Chaplain an' the full service, an' what his Captain had said about Bert bein' recommended for a pip, an' the irreparable loss an' so on. That was in Jan'y, '17. In Feb'y sometime or other I got saved. My specialty had come to be bombin' and night-doings. Very pleasant for a young free man, but—there's a limit to what you can stand. It takes all men differently. Noise was what started me, at last. I'd got just up to the edge—wonderin' when I'd crack an' how many of our men I'd do in if it came on me while we were busy. I had that nice taste in the mouth and the nice temperature they call trench-fever an'—I had to feel inside my head for the meanin' of every order I gave or was responsible for executin'. You know."

"We do. Go on!" said Pole in a tone that made Orton look at him.

"So, you see, the bettin' was even on my drawin' a V. C. or getting Number Empty Rest-Camp or—a firing-party before breakfast. But Gord saved me. (I made friends with him the last two years of the war. The others went off too quick.) They wanted a Bombin' Instructor for the Training Battalion at home, an' He put it into their silly hearts to indent for me. It took 'em five minutes to make me understand I was saved. Then I vomited an' then I cried. You know!" The fat face of Bevin had changed and grown drawn, even as he spoke, and his hands tugged as though to tighten an imaginary belt.

"I was never keen on bombin' myself," said Pole. "But bombin' instruction's murder!"

"I don't deny it's a shade risky—specially when they take the pin out an' start shakin' it—same as the Chinks used to do in the woods at Beauty, when they were cuttin' 'em down. But you live like a Home Defence Brigadier, besides week-end leaf. As a matter o' fact I married Bert's sister soon's I could after I got the billet; an' I used to lie in our bed thinkin' of the old crowd on the Somme an'—feelin' what a hound I was. Of course I earned two V.C.'s a week behind the traverse in the exercise of my ordinary duties, but that isn't the same thing. An' yet I'd only joined up because—I couldn't dam' well help it."

"An' what about your Queenslander?" the merciless Australian asked.

"Too de sweet! Pronto! We got a letter in May from a
Continued on page 62

Woman's Work is Never Done

but it can be made less toilsome

You owe it to her to provide as many conveniences as possible. Lighten her work by installing

Mueller Combination Spray Faucets

B-2281

Mueller Combination Sink Faucet with Swinging Spout and Spray.

Preserves the appearance of the hands: keeps them out of hot greasy water when washing dishes.

Rinses the sink and cleans vegetables thoroughly in a jiffy.

The swinging spout feature enables you to fill several vessels instead of lifting them about in the sink and can be placed back out of the way when not in use.

Has a thousand and one uses, that render it indispensable as a real labour saving device.

Mueller Combination Spray Faucets for the kitchen and bathroom save time for the Mother and lessen the drudgery with its monotonous daily routine.

Your plumber can install them in a few minutes.

MUELLER LIMITED

Sarnia

Ontario

A-2395

Mueller Combination Bath Faucet with Shower.

Here's the device every home without a built-in-shower should be enjoying this summer. Gives an exhilarating shower in the hot days.

Ideal for shampoos and a delight to the kiddies. Children require no urging to take a bath when this shower is part of the program. They just love it.

A shower bath requires less hot water, can be taken in less time and its running water is more sanitary than a stationary tub of water.

Last, but not least, he has the saving grace of humor. It is very easy to overrate a dull, plodding and learned man; just as, in the opinions of many, the contemporaries of Edward Blake exaggerated the merits of that sombre encyclopaedic statesman. It is just as easy to under-estimate the merits in statecraft of one who laughs and jests and unbends in every social situation which affords him the excuse. Tom Low hates pomposity, and is both lively and informal. His work, punctually and conscientiously discharged, is always put first; but when that is done, and well done, he gives play to the lighter side of his temperament. In a word, he combines what Stevenson called "a little judicious levity" with qualities as solid as are possessed by any man in public life to-day. And he possesses this very great advantage over many men whose success in politics has been rapid. His head has never been turned; his unaffected good humor has never been deflected; his swift promotion has left him the same simple and merry companion that he was when he first entered the Commons.

As Minister of Trade and Commerce he has no easy task. Twenty or even ten years ago this department was regarded as a sinecure. Our international trade had not achieved its present-day astonishing expansion, Canada was not a factor in the commerce of the world. To-day all that is changed. Canadian industry has doubled and trebled since the war; Canadian products are invading every land; Canadian manufacturers are competing with the producers of all the world. As a consequence, it is vital that the Department of Trade and Commerce should march abreast of the times, that it should be alert to Canadian opportunities, and that, through information, advice and wise regulations, as well as through its far-flung agents, it should help manufacturers in the great battle of trade. In that task, thus far, T. A. Low has done well.

A Friend of the Family

Continued from page 21

Brighton Hospital matron sayin' that one of the name of Hickmer was anxious for news o' me, previous to proceedin' to Roehampton for initiation into his new leg. Of course we applied for him by return. Bert had written about him to his sister—my missus—every time he wrote at all; an' any pal o' Bert's—well, you know what the ladies are like. I warned her about his peculiarities. She wouldn't believe till she saw him. He was just the same. You'd ha' thought he'd show up in England like a fresh stiff on snow—but you never noticed him. You never heard him, and if he didn't want to be seen, he wasn't there. He just joined up with his background. I knew he could do that with men, but now in Hell, seein' how curious women are, he could camouflage with the ladies—my wife an' my mother to wit—beats me!

"He'd feed the chickens for us; he'd stand on his one leg—it was off above the knee—and saw wood for us; he'd run—I mean he'd hop—errands for Mrs. B. or Mother; our dog worshipped him from the start, though I never saw him throw a word to him; and—yet he didn't take any place anywhere. You've seen a rabbit—you've seen a pheasant—hidin' in a ditch? Put your hand on it sometimes before it moved, haven't you? Well, that was Hickmot—with two women in the house, crazy to find out—find out—anything about him that made him human. You know what women are.

"He stayed with us a fortnight. He left us on a Sat'day to go to Roehampton to try his leg. On Friday he came over to the bombin' ground—not sayin' anything as usual—to watch me instruct my Suicide Club, which was only half an hour's run by rail from our village. He had his overcoat on an' as soon as he reached the place it was mafeesh with him as usual. Rabbit trick again! You never noticed him. He sat in the bomb proof behind the pit where the duds accumulate till it's time to explode 'em. Naturally, that's strictly forbidden to the public. So he went there, an' no one noticed him. When he'd had enough of watchin', he hopped off home to feed our chickens for the last time."

EARN MONEY AT HOME

YOU can earn $1 to $2 an hour in your spare time writing show cards. No canvassing or soliciting. We instruct you by our new simple Directograph System, supply you with work and pay you cash each week. Write today for full particulars and free booklet.

WEST-ANGUS SHOW CARD SERVICE LIMITED
Authorized Capital $1,250,000.00
99 Colborne Building, Toronto, Can.

For Wood Furniture

Will not bend, crack or chip. Look better and much more convenient than casters. Save your hardwood floors and carpets.

At your dealer's in all styles and sizes, smooth metal or glass base.

ONWARD MFG. CO. - Kitchener, Ont.

Onward

SLIDING
FURNITURE SHOES

"THEN how did you know all about it?" Orton said.

"Because I saw him come into the place just as I was goin' down into the trench. Then he slipped my memory till my train went back. But it would have made no difference what our arrangements were. If Hickmot didn't choose to be noticed—he wasn't noticed. Just for curiosity's sake I asked some o' the Staff Sergeants whether they'd seen him on the ground. Not one—not one single one had—or could tell me what he was like. An' Sat'day noon he went off—to Roehampton. We saw him into the train ourselves, with the lunch Mrs. B. had put up for him—a one-legged man an' his crutch in regulation blue, khaki warm an' kit-bag. Takin' everything together, per'aps he'd spoken as many as twenty times in the thirteen days he'd been with us. I'm givin' it you straight as it happened. An' now—look here!—this is what did happen.

"Between two and three that Sunday morning—dark an' blowin' from the North—I was woke up by an explosion, an' people shoutin' 'Raid!' The first bang fetched 'em out like worms after rain.

There was another—some minutes afterwards—an' me an' a Sergeant in the Shropshires on leaf told 'em all to take cover. They did. There was a devil of a long wait an' there was a third pop. Everybody, includin' me, heard airplanes. I didn't notice till afterwards that—"

Bevin paused. "What?" said Orton.

"Oh, I noticed a heap of things afterwards. What we noticed first—the Shropshire Sergeant an' me—was a rick well alight back o' Margetts's house an' with that north wind, blowin' straight on to another rick o' Margetts's. It went up all of a whoosh. The next thing we saw by the light of it was Margetts's house with a bomb hole in the roof and the rafters leanin' sideways like—like they always lean on such occasions. So we ran there, and the first thing we met was Margetts in his split-tailed nightie callin' on his mother an' damnin' his wife. A man always does that when he's cross. Have you noticed? Mrs. Margetts was in her nightie too, remindin' Margetts that he hadn't completed his rick insurance. An' that's a woman's lovin' care all over. Behind them was their oldest son, in trousers an' slippers, nursin' his arm an' callin' for the doctor. They went through us howlin' like flammenwerfer casualties—right up the street to the Surgery.

"Well, there wasn't anything to do except let the show burn out. We hadn't any means of extinguishing conflagrations. Some of 'em fiddled with buckets, an' some of 'em tried to get out some o' Margetts's sticks, but his younger son kept shoutin' 'Don't! Don't! It'll be stole! It'll be stole!' So it burned instead, till the roof came down top of all—a little, cheap, dirty villa. In real life one whizz-bang would have shifted it; but, in our civil village it looked that damned important and particular, you wouldn't believe. We couldn't get round to Margetts's stable because of the two ricks alight, but we found some one had opened the door early an' the horses was in Margetts's new vegetable piece down the hill which he'd hired off old Vigors to extend his business with. I love the way a horse always looks after his own belly—same as a gunner. They went to grazin' down the carrots and onions till young Margetts ran down to turn 'em out, an' then they got in among the glass frames an' out themselves. Oh, we had a regular Russian night of it; everybody givin' advice an' fallin' over each other. When it got light we saw the damage. House, two ricks an' stable mafeesh; the big glass-house with every pane smashed and the furnace-end of it blown clean out. All the horses an' about fifteen cattle—butcher's stores from the next field—feeding in the new vegetable piece. It was a fair clean-out from end to end; house, furniture, fittin's, plant, an' all the early crops."

"WAS there any other damage in the village?" I asked.

"I'm coming to it—the curious part—but I wouldn't call it damage. I was rentin' a field then for my chickens off the Merecroft Estate. It's accommodation land, an' there was a wet ditch at the bottom that I had wanted for ever so long to dam up to make a swim-hole for Mrs. Bevin's ducks."

"Ah!" said Orton, half turning in his chair, all in one piece.

"S'pose I was allowed? Not me. Their agent came down on me for tamperin' with the state's drainage arrangements.

An' all I wanted was to bring the bank down where the ditch narrows—a couple of cartloads of dirt would have held the water back for half-a-dozen yards—not more, give you my word, an' could have made a little spillway over the top with three boards—same as in the trenches. Well, the first bomb—the one that woke me up—had done my work for me better than I could. It had dropped just under the hollow of the bank an' brought it all down on a fair landslide. I'd got my swim-hole for Mrs. Bevin's ducks, an' I didn't see how the Estate could kick at the act o' God, d'you?"

"And Hickmot?" said Orton, grinning.

"Hold on! There was a Parish Council meetin' to demand reprisals, of course, an' there was the policeman an' me pokin' about among the ruins till the Explosives Expert came down in his motorcar at three p.m. Monday, an' he meets all the Margetts of their rockers howlin' in the Surgery—an' he sees my swim-hole fillin' up to the brim."

"What did he say?" Pole enquired.

"He sized it up at once. (He had to get back to dine in town that evening.) He said all the evidence proved that it was a lucky shot on the part of one isolated Hun 'plane goin' home, an' we weren't to take it to heart. I don't know that anybody but the Margetts did. He said they must have used incendiary bombs of a new type—which he'd suspected for a long time. I don't think the man was anything worse than God intended him to be. I don't really. But the Shropshire Sergeant said—"

"And what did you think?" I cut in.

"I didn't think. I knew by then. I'm not a Sherlock Holmes, but havin' chucked 'em an' chucked 'em back and kicked 'em out of the light an' slept with 'em for two years, an' makin' my livin' out of them at that time, I could recognize the fuse of a Mills bomb when I found it. I found all three of 'em. Curious about that second in Margetts's glass-house. Hickmot mus' have raked the ashes out of the furnace, popped it in, an' shut the furnace door. It operated all right. Not one livin' plane left in the putty, and all the brick-work spread round the yard in streaks. Just like that St. Firmin village we were talking about."

"But how d'you account for young what's-his-name gettin' his arm broken?" said Pole.

"Crutch!" said Bevin. "If you or me had taken on that night's doin's, with one leg, we'd have hopped and sweated from one flank to another an' been caught half way between. Hickmot didn't. I'm as sure as I'm sittin' here that he did his doings quiet and comfortable at his full height—he was over six feet—and no one noticed him. This is the way I see it. He fixed the swim-hole for Mrs. Bevin's ducks first. We used to talk over our own affairs in front of him, of course, and he knew just what she wanted in the way of a pond, so he went and made it at his leisure. Then he prob'ly went over to Margetts and lit the first rick, knowin' that the north wind 'ud do the rest. When young Margetts saw the light of it an' came out to look, Hickmot would have taken post at the back door an' dropped the young swine with his crutch, same as we used to drop Huns comin' out of a dug-out. You know how they blink at the light? Then he must have walked off an' opened Margetts's stable door to save the horses. They'd be more to him than any man's life. Then he prob'ly chucked one bomb on top o' Margetts's roof, havin' seen that the first rick had caught the second and that the whole house was bound to go. D'you get me?"

"THEN why did he waste his bomb on the house?" said Orton. His glass eye seemed as triumphant as his real one.

"For camouflage, of course. He was camouflagin' an air-raid. When the Margetts piled out of their place into the street, he prob'ly attended to the glass-house, because that would be Margetts's chief means o' business. After that—I think so because otherwise I don't see where all those extra cattle came from that we found in the vegetable piece—he must have walked off an' rounded up all the butcher's beasts in the next medder, an' driven 'em there to help the horses. And when he'd finished everything he'd set out to do, I'll lay my life an' kit he curled up like a bloomin' wombat not fifty yards away from the whole flamin' show—an' let us run round him. An' when he'd had his sleep out, he went up to Roehampton Monday mornin' by some train that he's

Refresh Yourself

You see the name, Coca-Cola, brightening streets and corners everywhere—more familiar than the names of the streets themselves.

That's because this beverage has individuality.

From pure cane sugar to natural fruit flavors, every ingredient is a pure product from nature—blended with a finished art that comes from a lifetime of practice to give you wonderful, wholesome refreshment.

To supply the demand syrup factories have been built at Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver, and modern bottling plants established in these four cities and in Quebec, Ottawa, Kingston, Belleville, Peterboro, Hamilton, London, Windsor, Port Arthur, Brandon, Regina, Saskatoon, Moose Jaw, Calgary, Edmonton, Lethbridge.

Drink

Coca-Cola

Delicious and Refreshing

Sold everywhere—in bottles and at soda fountains

The Coca-Cola Company of Canada, Ltd.
Head Office: Toronto

For generations, Fox's have sent much good Somerset weave to foreign parts and the British Colonies, in response to the demand for the world's finest woollen cloth.

When Fox's brand cloth "Superfine" or "Fine," these words mean exactly what they say.

Have Fox "Superfine" for lounge and social wear, and Fox "Fine" for professional or business use; or Fox "Standard" if you want sound, pure woollen cloth at a moderate price.

Ask your tailor to show you these West of England fabrics, and be sure to see the grade name, with Fox's trade mark, on reverse of cloth or on a label in clothes.

Fox's Trade Mark Guarantees Pure Woollen Fabric that will give sound service—should it shrink or fade, on land or sea, a length of similar quality cloth will be given as free replacement.

FOX

WOOLLEN FABRICS

Serges, Botanies, Tweeds (also Fox-Bliss Tweeds) and Cheviots, Saxories and Fancy Worsted, in "Superfine," "Fine" and "Standard" grades. And Fox's Improved Puttees.

Manufactured by
FOX BROTHERS & CO., LTD.
Wellington, Somerset, England.

Wholesale Agent:
J. H. Shaw 285, Beaver Hall Hill, Montreal.

If You Suffer from Goitre

You will find quick relief from Dr. Tefft's external treatment. There is no burning or blistering. It promptly relieves that TIGHTNESS, STOPS CHOKING, and causes the average GOITRE to vanish in a short time, leaving the neck in its original condition. So sure are we that it will do this for you we ask

No Pay Until Benefited

Write AT ONCE for our guarantee and full information of this wonderful preparation that you JUST RUB ON.

The Dr. Tefft Laboratory, 128-C. N. Park Ave., Buffalo, N. Y., or 196 Bedford Rd., Toronto decided upon in his own mind weeks an' weeks before."

"Did he know all the trains then?" said Pole.

"Ask me another. I only know that if he wanted to get from any place to another without bein' noticed, he did it."

"And the bombs? He got 'em from you, of course," Pole went on.

"What do you think? He was an hour in the park watchin' me instruct, sittin', as I remember, in the bomb-proof by the dud-hole, in his overcoat. He got 'em all right. He took neither more nor less than he wanted, an' I've told you what he did with 'em—one—two—an' three."

"Ever see him afterwards?" said Orton, illuminated with delight.

"Yes. Saw him at Brighton when I went down there with the missus, not a month after he'd been broken into his Roehampton leg. You know how the boys used to sit all along Brighton front in their blues, an' jump every time the coal was bein' delivered to the hotels behind them. I barged into him opposite the Old Ship, an' I told him about our air-raid. I told him how Margetts had gone off his rocker an' walked about starin' at the sky an' holdin' reprisal meetin's all by himself; an' how old Mr. Vigers had bought in what he'd left—tho' of course, I said what was left—o' Margetts' business; an' how well my swimhole for the ducks was doin'. It didn't interest him. He didn't want to come over to stay with us any more, either. We were a long, long way back in his past. You could see that. He wanted to get back with his new leg, to his own God-forsaken sheep-walk an' his black fellers in Queensland. I expect he's doin' it now, an' no one has noticed him. But, by Gord!" Bevin suddenly slipped his fat smooth fist on his knees. "He did leak a little at the end. He did that much! When we was waitin' for the tram to the station, I said how grateful I was to Fritz for moppin' up Margetts an' makin' our swim-hole all in one night. Mrs. B. seconded the motion. We couldn't have done less. Well, then Hickmot said, speakin' in his queer way, as if English words were all new to him: 'Ah, go on an' bail up in Hell,' he said. 'Bert was my friend.' That was all. I've given it you just as it happened, word for word. I'd hate to have an Australian have it in for me for anything I'd done to his friend. Mark you, I don't say there's anything wrong with you Australians, Brother Orton. I only say they ain't like us or anyone else that I know."

"Well, do you want us to be?" said Orton, with his thin-lipped smile.

"No, no. It takes all sorts to make a world, as the sayin' is. And now," Bevin pulled out his gold watch. "If I don't make a move of it I'll miss my last train."

"Let her go," said Orton serenely. "You've done some lorry-hoppin' in your time, haven't you—Sergeant?"

"When I was two an' a half stone lighter, Digger," Bevin smiled.

"Well, I'll run you out home before sun-up. I'm a haulage contractor now—London and Oxford. There's an empty of mine ordered to Oxford. We can go round by Aylesbury as easy as not. She's lyin' out Vauxhall way."

"My Gord! An' see the sun rise again. Haven't seen him since I can't remember when," said Bevin, chuckling. "Oh, there was fun sometimes in Hell, wasn't there, Australia?" and again his hands went down to tighten the belt that was missing.

"The Enemies to Each Other," a story of Adam and Eve and queer things in the garden, will be Rudyard Kipling's contribution to the July 15 issue of MacLean's.

The Rich Cinderella

Continued from page 15

and pushed it open. At almost the same moment the car's headlights were switched off so that the watching man could discern only the gray outline of the Durelia roadster as it crept in through the gray rectangle of light. It stopped and moved on again and stopped altogether. Then the engine was switched off and the utter silence hung oppressive.

Wyckoff could see the moving silhouette of his servant as the latter stepped, oddly deliberate, to the side of the car. Quite as distinctly he could make out the silhouette of the woman now standing on that car's running board. It was his daughter Serena.

He was bewildered by a throaty little sound that came from her, a sound that impressed him as something half-way between a sigh and a coo, as tremulous as a pigeon's. Then his momentary small bewilderment was swallowed up by a new astonishment, mountainous and overwhelming. For the man called Jones had raised his arms to the woman waiting on the running-board and the figure poised there had reached out a pair of answering arms, so that the two silhouettes merged and melted into one and stood interlocked. They remained clasped hungrily together, without speaking, or moving, for what seemed a vast stretch of time to the wheezing watcher in the deeper shadow of the garage end. They remained clinging to each other, with that repeated pigeon coo of tremulous contentment, until a step sounded on the gravel at the garage door. Then the interlocking shadows separated and moved still farther apart at the slightly high-pitched call of a man who stepped quickly in through the door shadow.

It was Tyssen. He padded along the wall for a moment as if exploring for a light switch. Then with his repeated thin cry of exasperation he struck a match. The mounting flame brought the three intent faces out of the darkness, a floating triangle of challenge and counter-challenge.

"I thought so!" cried the newcomer at last, with his stifled note of triumph.

"So you're spying again, Noel?" remarked the woman, with singular quietness.

"Somebody needs to be spying when a thing like this is going on," was Tyssen's high-pitched retort. And he fell to groaning as the match dropped from his fingers. "Oh God! Oh God, this is awful!"

"Shut up!" commanded Jones's voice, slightly raucous and slightly impatient.

"Great heavens, Serena, what has happened to you?" Tyssen cried out, ignoring that command. "Have you lost your reason? Have you forgotten everything?"

It was then that Jones thrust himself between the two, with his back to the woman.

"Listen to me, you anemic Nance you!" he called out with deliberated contempt. "I'll mash your face in if you whimper around here like that. This is my affair. And you've no hand in it!"

"I'll kill you!" Tyssen cried out with soprano-like shrillness.

"Oh, no you won't!" retorted the deeper voice. "You haven't got the guts, in the first place, and you won't get the chance, in the second. And I'm telling you again to get out of here before I break you over my knee."

There was a sound of movement on the cemented floor, the imploring voice of the girl, and then Tyssen's voice from the corner nearer the doorway.

"For Heaven's sake, Serena, come back to the house. You've got to come back. Come back or I'll bring your father here."

"Jim," called out Darius Wyckoff's daughter as she turned to his hired servant, "what shall I do?"

The chauffeur's voice was so quiet that it sounded indifferent. "The only thing that there is to do," was his answer. "Go to the house and get what you need. I'll do the same here." He turned and took a step or two in the dim light. Then he stopped again. "And if this—this half man tries any interfering, I'll wring his neck for him!"

WYCKOFF, leaning against the curving car fender, could hear the hurrying light steps on the drive gravel. He could hear the heavier steps that crossed to the slide door opening on the stairway leading to the living quarters above. He could hear the deliberate tread of Jones's feet as he mounted that stairway. And he could hear his own breathing, quick and asthmatic, in the quietness finally broken by the steps of Noel Tyssen as he turned in the doorway and followed the quicker footfalls along the drive that led towards the house.

Wyckoff called after him. But his strangled voice failed to carry. He kept saying "Good God!" over and over again as he groped his way through the darkness. He stumbled once or twice as he moved on